Granny's Little Riding Hood

Liliana Cinetto
Poly Bernatene

She went to visit her granny — no surprise there.

She carried some very important things in her basket — we know that, too.

She put on her riding hood before heading out — obviously.

Needless to say, she had to go through a R-E-A-L-L-Y dangerous forest, all by herself.

And of course, once she finally reached her granny's house, the door was wide open.

- Granny! - she called for her while going inside.

No one answered. She made her way through the dark towards granny's bedroom. The wooden floor creaked beneath her light footfalls, breaking the silence.

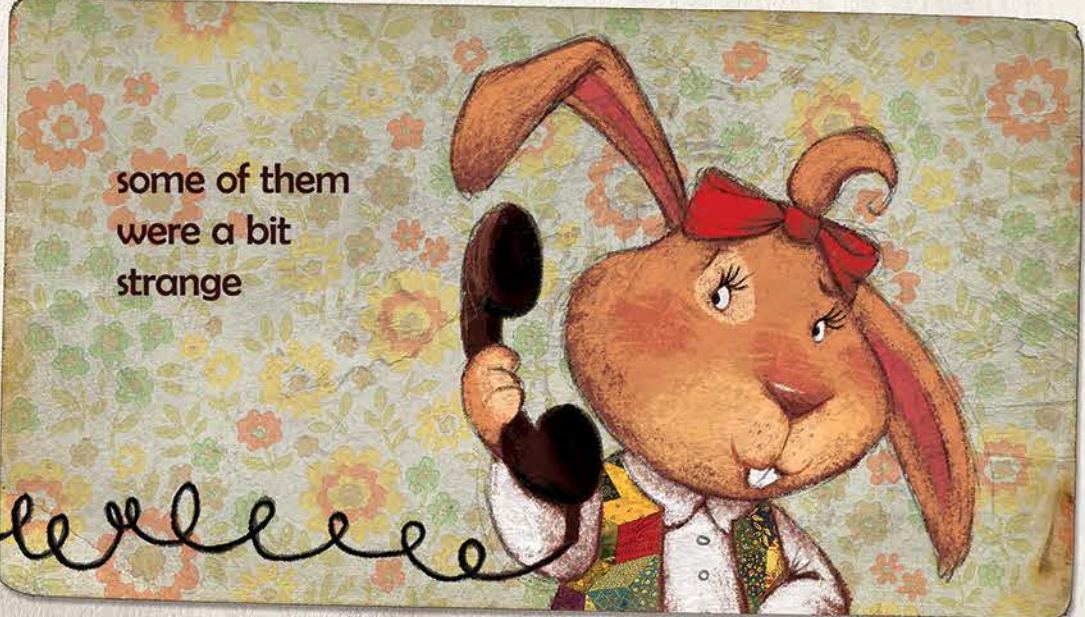

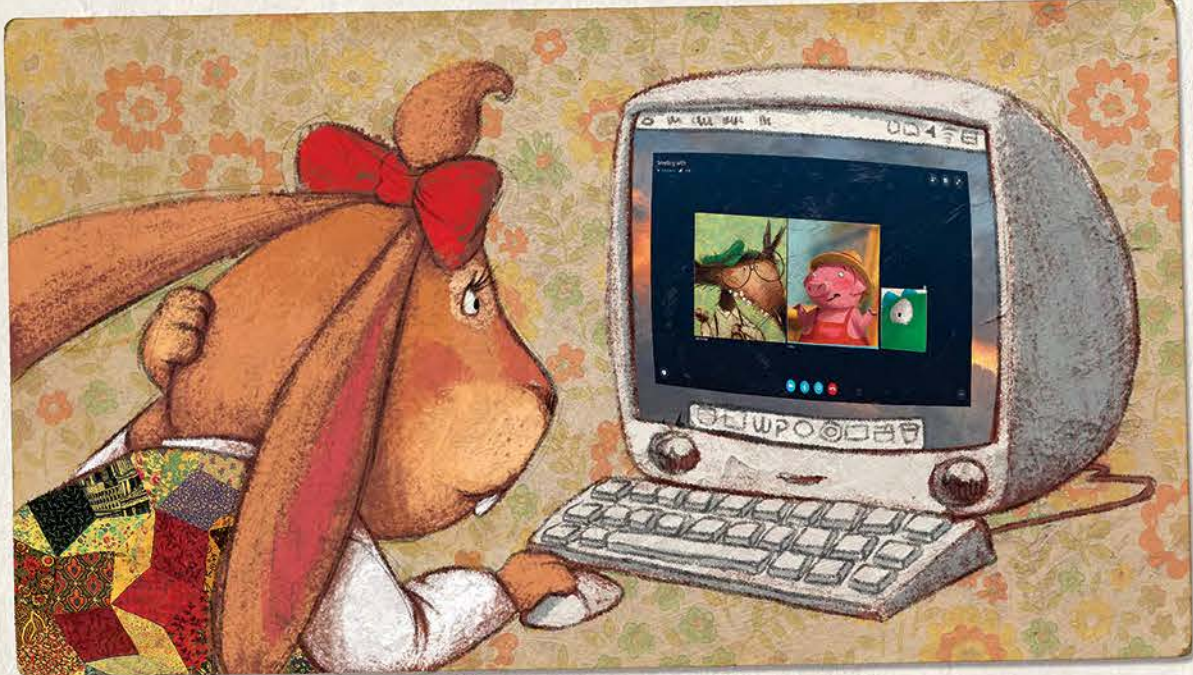

- Granny? - she asked, and entered the bedroom.

It was a complete mess. All her granny's clothes, including her nightgown and her sleeping cap, were scattered on the floor. The bed was unmade, and even worse than that: it was empty.

"Obviously, the wolf gobbled her up!", anyone would assume...

But then... where was granny?
She tried to reach her in a hundred ways...

but got no answer.

It was at that time when someone knocked on the window — a homing pigeon, carrying a letter for her. She finally understood.

Breathing easier now, she opened the letter and began to read:

My dearest grandchild:

I'm sorry I left without saying good-bye, but something really important came up and I couldn't leave it unattended. You know me, I like lending a hand to those in need.

I also enjoy travelling around the world and catching up with friends. I'll send you pictures and postcards of all the places I visit, of course. Oh, I know: postcards are a thing of the past. So is this letter. But you get to treasure them, just like the moments we shared together — that's the beauty of it.

It'll probably take me a long time to come back. Don't you worry about it. I just happened to choose the long way home. As you may have realised during our walks through the woods, the shortest paths aren't as interesting, nor safer.

And if I don't ever come back,
please, don't be sad.

We all get to have one last journey
— that's just the way it is.
